Modern smartphones are incredibly complex, with the ability to display a wide range of content and navigate a complex set of color gamuts, file formats and media types. Occasionally, however, some of those capabilities interact with each other in unforeseen ways, and you get a problem like this. As first seen by the Ice Universe Twitter account, using the wrong wallpaper on an Android phone can send the device in a soft brick. Although not technically dead, the phone will boot endlessly due to Android's inability to handle the color space used for the next photo. Note: Viewing the photo will not damage your Android device, just don't set it as wallpaper. Warning!!! Never set this image as wallpaper, especially for Samsung mobile phone users! It'll make your phone crash! Don't try! If someone sends you this picture, please ignore it. pic.twitter.com/v7boz3dhkL—Ice Universe (@UniverseIce) May 31, 2020 Here's an example of what the actual soft boot looks like. Update: Samsung received feedback on this type of error in mid-May, and has resolved this issue. Just wait for the subsequent firmware update and don't take the risk. pic.twitter.com/oa7rxnKSkb: the behavior of the ice universe (@UniverseIce) of June 1, 2020Device seems to vary slightly depending on the model and manufacturer. Sometimes people have been able to change their wallpaper before the device crashes or use the TWRP recovery tool, but this seems to be more the exception than the rule. Most of the time, affected users have no choice but to perform a factory reset. Samsung is working on a solution in UEFI, and Android 11 must also solve the problem. In the meantime, do not use this image for the wallpaper. According to developer Davide Bianco, the problem is caused by the lack of support for non-sRGB images on the Android system itself. This is why you can see the image very well in the browser, but setting it as wallpaper will temporarily lock your phone. When SystemUI tries to assign color values, the values in the previous image exceed the size of the array and lock the phone. In theory, such images can be used as a booby trap. Send someone a gorgeous wallpaper, install it, and boom - your device is now in boot loop. Android 11 will solve the problem by supporting wallpapers that are not sRGB without this kind of problem. Strangely, not all Android devices are to this problem. A Huawei Mate 20 Pro was not blocked when tested by 9to5Google and OnePlus devices is also rumored to be immune. Samsung products, on the other hand, are not. Specific restrictions or software changes on Huawei and OnePlus devices may allow them to handle this type of content differently. Either way, better not random people wallpaper source until this problem is resolved, unless you have recently backed up your phone. Phone, of course, it has had similar problems — on two separate occasions, sending the wrong character to an iPhone has been shown to cause it to crash. Now read: One of the advantages of having an Android phone is that it's easy to customize. Each phone may look the same on the outside, but may differ inside.
